At least some known power system components are operated by applying variable voltage or current loads to the power system components. These power system components are often switched in and out of the circuit under the control of a power controller. The power controller may determine a power output for each switching period based on a duty cycle (or on a power output set point for an active period) and one or more power system conditions. At least some known power controller circuitry may be configured to control switching between phases of a power system by varying a duty cycle with respect to a power system voltage. By varying a duty cycle, a voltage level of a power system output may be increased or decreased. However, when the amount of power system output is greater than an allowable maximum power capacity for a circuit that is designed to handle the power system output, power flow to the power system output may be limited to a safe operating level, resulting in a power system overload. Additionally, when power system output is limited to a safety level, the efficiency of the power system is decreased.If this is your first visit, be sure to check out the FAQ by clicking the link above. Re: The difference between olim and issurim - these are still not clear. No disagreement from me, this is basic logic. Where did you get the Ch. 15:16 that "issurim have been added to Olim"? I know of no such source. Please answer a q. Which is greater. A) the length of the Mitzvah or B) the number of the Mitzvah? Again, no problem for you in not answering this question, but no one is on the ball who says that the

Controlling the wettability of ultrafine oxide particles (UFPs) has attracted many researchers' interest because they are the key to the development of various functional applications. Here we present a strategy to control the wettability of UFPs by controlling the aggregation behavior in a stable water dispersion. The microstructures of the aggregates were observed and analyzed, and three different systems were chosen to be the examples: nonionic surfactant (SDS), polymeric surfactants (polydiallyldimethylammonium chloride, poly-DADMAC), and ionic surfactant (sodium dodecyl sulfate, SDS). The results showed that, the amount of the surfactants adsorbed on the surface of the UFPs was related to their surface charge. Thus, these adsorbed surfactants on the UFPs led to the formation of the aggregates with different morphologies by the electrostatic attraction. This work provided a simple approach to produce hierarchical aggregates of high specific surface areas,
