The intersection of customer service and marketing has moved into the forefront of organizations' minds as they assess the effectiveness of their programs. Unfortunately, many businesses appear to view customer service as an afterthought. Unfortunately, such thinking puts companies in danger of reaching the same frustrating state in which many companies are now found, where organizations end up with overworked, confused, and frustrated customer service personnel, and frustrated customers who eventually choose to either not return to the business or to use other organizations. The key to a successful program is to understand what customer service is and what it is not, and to understand that an effective customer service program requires customer service representatives who are professionally trained and knowledgeable, and who understand the unique marketing and selling challenges faced by the companies for which they are responsible. This invention relates generally to digital speech recognition, and more particularly to a system and method for the statistical control of ambiguous recognition outputs. In the present state of the art, the speech recognition system that is employed in the most common application, telephony, operates by automatically recognizing one spoken utterance at a time. Such a system compares the input speech with a stored model representing the words that can be pronounced by the human speaker. During this comparison operation, ambiguous or ungrammatical or garbled speech utterances are usually treated as a single word and can be forced into the grammatical model by the system. Thus, the resulting recognition output is usually an incomplete or erroneous one. Such automatic speech recognition systems, therefore, are unsuitable for many other applications where the recognition output needs to be statistically analyzed by the system. For example, a banking application would generally require the system to recognize each individual spoken utterance, which requires a full-time operator to continually monitor the telephone line and re-listen to any ungrammatical utterances that are forced into the system. Another application where the recognition output needs to be statistically analyzed is the domain of accounting. In a typical accounting application, a telephonic conversation takes place between the caller and a system operator. The caller asks for his account balance, which the operator may or may not remember. The operator cannot afford
