During the company's legal troubles, Graves' part of EA laid down on the line. Graves agreed to take a plea deal and plead guilty in exchange for his testimony against the company. He testified against EA at the E3 Media and Business Summit, and revealed that many of EA's most senior executives had planned the development of the behemoth game SimCity, and that many of the negative reviews of the game were not true, the game was "rigged". When the smoke cleared, the in-house EA legal team had managed to get four individuals convicted of securities fraud, whereas EA itself escaped with a $60 million fine. His testimony resulted in a change of management at EA. The Electronic Entertainment Examiners announced that the new president, John Riccitiello, would resign within a week of the plea deal. Many had speculated that it was Graves' testimony that led to Riccitiello's departure. Graves was fired from GitHub later in 2016. Despite the fact that the plea deal meant that he would only spend two years in prison (he was already spending a year in pretrial detention), Graves went to prison nonetheless. He spent 9 days in a federal prison before being released on parole. Graves released his first book, How to Make a Game Out of Anything, in October 2017. In 2018, Graves founded a games publishing company called Cookie Jar Games. His second book, The Tech of Game Making: How to Build an Amazing Game for Free, will be published in the spring of 2019.
