Testicular histopathological changes in rats injected with sodium selenite. The effects of sodium selenite on male rats' reproductive system were studied. Male rats injected with Se were examined in regard to the testis function. The contents of testicular hormones, the histopathology of testis and epididymis and the immunohistological distribution of receptors in testis were examined. The results showed that Se showed inhibitory effects on the testis. The levels of cholesterol, testosterone, luteinising hormone (LH), estradiol-17 beta and follicle stimulating hormone (FSH) were decreased, while the levels of prolactin (PRL) increased in the Se-treated rats. Moreover, the testes of the Se-treated rats showed significant histopathological changes. On the other hand, the immunohistological distributions of receptors and the protein kinase activities were also changed in the Se-treated rats. These results suggested that a decrease in the testicular hormones caused by a decrease in their synthesis and an increase in their catabolism may be responsible for the histopathological changes in the testis. Ask HN: Can someone please explain how coffee beans extract caffeine? - vishrutjadi I'm trying to understand this mechanism. Is it because the caffeine is bound to complex proteins and the proteins somehow gets broken down during the process to release the caffeine? ===== dozzie Caffeine is a natural alkaloid (a compound derived from amine); it's a molecule which forms hydrogen bonds with proteins and other molecules, so it binds to them. Coffee beans do not contain caffeine in the alkaloid form, but there is the lactone form, which is much more effective, so the very hot water first releases caffeine from it (in the alkaloid form), then the alkaloid is separated from the rest. It would be very hard for the coffee beans to separate caffeine from the rest; it's what the process is for. ~~~ vishrutjadi Thanks a lot! ----- danieka Caffeine can be extracted using a solvent, which denatures the protein molecule
