The standard lists JavaScript as a regular language, which means that it contains the empty string as a valid input and will accept it. However, the input "]" is not valid, because it contains the end of a regular expression match, thus failing the empty match test. Each character is defined by a Unicode code point. The standard defines certain characters to be representable directly in JavaScript, including 0, ., !, and @, as well as a range of Latin and other characters that may require backslash-escaping, such as \x20 through \x7e. A string may contain any Unicode character, including those that require escaping. To ensure that the input to an expression is always valid, the latter form is chosen as the syntax. The following test strings are examples of valid inputs. ""js'ab\c' 2092ce491b
