Understanding layers, layers, layers Photoshop layers enable you to arrange the various objects in a digital image. A layer is a group of bits of information displayed in an image. Layers can contain all sorts of bits of information from various elements, such as text, shapes, and images, to more important information, such as color settings, transformations, and effects. Layers overlap one another, revealing each one of them as you work in Photoshop, just as layers would in a multicolored painting. When you edit a particular layer or groups of layers, you add on to the layer and edit the layers you selected. If you apply effects to the layer, they apply only to the layers you selected.

[Surgical treatment of pneumatocele]. The author describes his own experiences in pneumatocele surgery. The recognition of pneumatoceles is often difficult due to their asymptomatic character. A long lasting characteristic radiographic image is the essential requirement for the clinical diagnosis. In the most frequent cases adequate treatment can be carried out by complete mobilization of the intrathoracic gas volume followed by a T-tube and anterior pleurotomy. If no history of trauma is found then the existing pneumatocele should be treated surgically.

Q: C++ Return false if one value is in another vector
The question here is simple and straight forward but I can't seem to figure out an easy, neat way to do it. I have an element type, say, Person. I would like to have a method in a class, say, Foo, which checks if a Person object is a member of another vector of Person objects. This is easy if the vector is a class member. However, it is an external parameter to the method. I would like to have a function in the class Foo like this: `bool IsMember(const vector &list) { // Check if the Person is a member of a list of person by using the // '==' operator. return (*it == list); }` The problem is that we would want a way to fail if the Person is a member of the list or the list is missing, and we don't want to modify the list at all. So, what should be returned to inform the caller? My thoughts: `return false;` is the usual way to indicate such situations. However, vector has an `erase()` function for removing elements in the middle of the vector. So, `return true` to indicate that it is present and `return false` to indicate that it is not. All of the values in the vector should be compared. However, this requires a loop. This is problem #2. We would have a loop and then check if one element is equal to a other element. If they are equal, we know that one Person object is a member of the other one. Use of the not operator in a loop -- `not(a == b)`, which would cause an infinite loop if we don't exit. I am quite stumped on this one, so any help would be greatly appreciated

Q: Bootstrap 4 column with side scrolling content
I am currently trying to create a grid system that has side scrolling content within the same column as the body. The columns in the table overflow to the next column with the `overflow-y` set to `scroll`. However, that doesn't allow the column to have a responsive or any browser mobile view, it just flickers in view. I tried using flexbox but I am not sure how to go about this. And the CSS `.container { display: flex; flex-direction: row; flex-wrap: wrap; height: 100vh; overflow-y: scroll; }` Is there a better way to accomplish this using bootstrap 4? A: I figured it out. What I did was just wrap the content in another container with `flex-grow: 1` on the container, so it can be content.

Q: How to use a python unittest module inside another module in a different directory?
How do I use a Test module, which is in another directory from the directory of the current file, to test my python file. I am using Python 3.x and unittest, I tried a few commands I came across online, but I don't know if it is correct or not. The commands I used are: `from..__init__ import *` `from.selector import *` A: This is quite common in the Python community. If you look at the docs for the `unittest.main()`, you will find that the function to run the test(s) is a builtin function. Here is an example of a class that uses a main method to run tests (untested code): `from unittest import TestCase import unittest class TestStuff(TestCase): def test1(self): self.assertTrue(True) def test2(self):`
