The Real Deal Miami Managers loathe the condo turnaround plan The condo conversion law is one of the core tools of Miami-Dade's strategy of spurring the arrival of new, higher-end buyers who are ready to put down down bigger deposits and finance a much higher mortgage. But as the condo conversion plan has come under fire from condo owners and developers this spring — major reaction came with plans announced for a series of meetings with people not directly connected with the county — so have a number of high-profile faces who have otherwise been supportive of the condo conversion law, like City Commissioner Jose "Pepe" Diaz. Diaz was at Tuesday's panel, and when I asked whether he was still supportive of the conversion plan, he said he wasn't sure. "That's the problem, the very nature of the project," he said, when I asked if he believed the condo conversion law would be good for condo prices. The panel's moderator pointed out that some condo owners were now opposed to the conversion law, and Diaz said he agreed. "Of course," he said. "That's natural. That's the market." It was too early to tell whether the plan would be a success, he said, adding that it had the possibility of being good for the market. "I hope it is good," he said. "I hope there is a price increase. I hope there is more money coming in. But that's the market."
